To start the training project, we gathered information about the current resident assistant training programs at the University of Maryland. This was especially easy as one of our group members is a current RA and has been for 3 years. Therefore, she conducted the interviews rather quickly, and from those transcripts we were able to pinpoint the current pitfalls within the RA training programs surrounding trans and non-binary youth. From the interview with a trans student, we figured out what topics are not too personal or invasive, and how to truly make these students feel comfortable and cared for. I would say that one majorly unexpected was the finding that the trans students we spoke to highlighted this need for help to be universal and less tailored as they aren't looking to be singled out or be given extra attention for who they are, but instead just want to be treated and supported equitably. This piece of information changed our approach and is the main reason why we went towards and pronoun and what gender is style for the training video. One challenging aspect of conducting this training, and I'm sure other training as well, is choosing the correct words when describing and talking about an experience that is not your own. Amidst the LGBTQ+ community, many terms may be deemed offensive as well as some phrasing, and while we do our best to avoid these, it is also important to address them from a teaching and training perspective. Therefore I would say, and especially for me because I did some of the voice-over for the video, this was probably my biggest challenge, but definitely because I just am nervous to offend or say anything incorrectly. To assess the effectiveness of the training I would probably send out some type of survey to the RA's before the training to see where their knowledge on trans and nonbinary students and services at UMD lies, and then send one after to gauge if any improvement of at least general awareness and knowledge occurred. Then on the flip side, I would probably interview and reconnect with trans and non-binary students to see if they feel that their RA's provided a confidently knowledgeable and comfortable space for them.
